AVENGERS: ENDGAME
CHARACTERS RECOUNT

The new instalment of the Avengers superhero film series is without a doubt one of the most anticipated films of the year, with millions of fans waiting for its release. One of the saddest and most eye-catching parts of the prequel Avengers: Infinity War was the death of many beloved characters. Metro highlights superheroes who survived, the dead, and those who might reappear.

It is a direct sequel to 2018's Avengers: Infinity War, 2012's Marvel's The Avengers and 2015's Avengers: Age of Ultron, and the 22nd film in the Marvel Cinematic Universe (MCU).

In the film, the surviving members of the Avengers and their allies work to reverse the damage caused by Thanos in Infinity War.

The film is directed by Anthony and Joe Russo.

April 26, 2019 is the scheduled release of the movie in the U.S.

In late December 2018, the film was named as the second-most anticipated 2019 movie by IMDb; the most anticipated blockbuster of 2019 according to the ticketing service Fandango and the most anticipated film overall by Atom Tickets.

Skull Fist avoid thinking of fame

Vocalist Zach Slaughter chatted with Metro about his way of seeing music. GABRIELA ACOSTA SILVA, MWN

Members of the heavy metal band Skull Fist. PROVIDED

Skull Fist are a heavy metal band formed in 2006 in Toronto, Ontario. Vocalist and guitarist Zach Slaughter talked about the time they are going through and how he feels after undergoing several surgeries.

"During the last two or three years, there were many surgeries. I'm back and stronger than ever," Slaughter said. "I went through a difficult personal moment, but that's how life works sometimes. You cannot win every battle, you just have to keep pushing to win the majority. You have to minimize the loss but not eliminate it. I feel strong."

Despite his positive attitude in life, the musician avoids thinking about the evolution of Skull Fist. "I do not know, I never think about that. I only think about personal progress, I suppose. I spend all my time on that [laughs]. Music is just a way to express thoughts about different topics and eliminate them from my brain. At the end, I put them into a song and then they are buried in the ground [laughs]. I like it this way. I'm fine with what happens to the band in any way, as long as I can continue making music. I do not care about our popularity."

"I have no idea what is being done in music. I just like to do it! It's good to put the thoughts on tracks and release them."

Zach Slaughter

In a joking tone, the guitarist pointed out that he sometimes has to pretend while being onstage. "Sometimes I do not have a lot of energy and I usually pretend, but I do not like to interact if I do not feel like it. I mean, I'm just there because music is entertainment, and maybe the lyrics are something that you agree with. I think if I go up and pretend to be excited and I'm not, that would not be fair to the people. I think people can understand that, everyone has so many different feelings and emotions all the time."

Zach Slaughter is usually quite direct, and he shared what he likes about music.

"I like the music that I like and I do not care if other people like something else. I think it's great that vinyl is back. I do not see a difference in quality when it is digitally recorded and then transferred to vinyl, but it's fun that people have the option to listen to music in different formats," he concluded.

Always evolving

Comedian Alonzo Bodden is hitting the stage in Boston on May 5.

MOLLY GIVEN
Molly.Given@metro.us

Comedian Alonzo Bodden is coming to Boston on May 5 to hit the stage at the WBUR CitySpace for one night only. Bodden is known for his no-holds-barred social commentary, hilarious viewpoint and overall bold outlook on the world today. But Bodden isn't in the comedy game to shove his viewpoints down anyone's throat or to try to butcher anyone's opinions. The New York native simply wants to highlight how comical the world is despite the hate and negativity that surround the news today. Bodden sat down with Metro to talk about his career, how his act is always evolving and what to expect from his show.

How would you describe your comedy to someone who has maybe never seen or heard you?
Topical, snarky, commonsense and a truth-teller.

You're known for your social and political commentary. Does your stand-up involve that as well?
Oh yes, that's my favorite thing about stand-up, talking about the issues and talking about what's going on. I think Carlin was the greatest ever at social commentary, and I was once described as the spawn of Carlin, which I took as a pretty high compliment.

You have had quite the career so far. You've worked for Trevor Noah, NPR, Jay Leno and you host your own podcast. What would you say have been some high points of your career and, on the flip side, some low points?
Well, highlights include being a part of the Montreal Comedy Festival, which is the biggest in the world, and winning "Last Comic Standing." I've worked with so many legends in comedy as well, including Don Rickles, George Wallace, Jay Leno, George Carlin. Those would be highlights, working with people like that. You know, there aren't too many lowlights onstage. I don't even know if it's a lowlight or it's just really funny, but I grew up in New York and I started my career in L.A. I went back to New York and I actually performed in a little club in my old neighborhood where I grew up, and I got booed off the stage. It was early in my career, and I didn't just get booed off the stage, I actually got booed out the door and onto the street. Yeah, it was not good. I liken it to me opening up for a Trump rally after giving them my NPR credits.

> "I get to see the people, and I get to talk to people. My comedy is all about interaction."

You're traveling a lot this year with your stand-up. What do you like the most about bringing your comedy on the road?
I get to see the people, and I get to talk to people. My comedy is all about interaction. Plus, I get to see so many parts of the country. We have truly become two countries, one red and one blue. It's funny, in L.A. I used to tell people [that] as much as California loves Barack Obama, that's how much Alabama can't stand Barack Obama. Now it's the opposite. When Trump says something that is utterly ridiculous, I remind people, you know millions of people believe what he just said. We are in a different era now. We are in an era of fabrication and ridiculousness and so on. So that's what I get to see in my national travel. My international travel, well, when you get to go to different countries it gives you such a great perspective on the world. I mean, having been through the Middle East, from Iraq to Kuwait to Egypt to Jordan to Israel and so on, you see the relationships and you see the people and you realize, oh wait, these people don't spend all day hating each other and trying to kill each other. They go to work and try to feed their kids, pretty much like humans. You see things like that and it's fascinating. Or seeing the history of the world. Those are the big benefits of travel. Then sometimes I go places where I never would expect, like Pakistan. Not high on the tourist list but I got to see them, so it's pretty cool.

You talked a little bit about the sensitive social climate the country is in today. Does that ever come into play with your comedy when you travel to different states?
Rarely do I adjust for a club show. If I'm doing a corporate event or if they hired me to do something, then I'm probably not going to get too political. But when I'm in a club, I speak my truth. What happens is, they'll be some that get angry and they'll be some people that leave, which means I'm doing it right. But quite often people are like, "I don't agree with you but I think you're really funny." I don't encounter as much as other comics because, let's face it, I'm a black comic and they kind of know where I stand regarding racism and right-wing politics. They don't walk into shows thinking, now this guy should be really pro-Trump.

When you first started your career, were you interested in comedy and then figured it fit wwith the social and political climate, or were you more interested in politics and then the comedy just was birthed from there?
I started out doing more personal material, telling stories about my life, my dating and my family. It was really during "Last Comic Standing" and after the show that I became more topical. It became more fun to joke about what happened [that] week. I began to find politics and social issues funnier than my life. So I would definitely say it changed after the show. But now I'm actually starting to try and look back into my personal stuff and trying to bring more of that out.

Do you have anything else coming up that fans can look out for?
Yes, I have a special coming out on Amazon. I recorded it at the end of 2018 and it will be released this year. The only thing about being a topical comic and doing specials and CDs is, time moves so fast. I could be talking about something from six months ago and it seems like a lifetime. In the time it takes to produce it, you're just like, wow, the narrative has changed again. You have to keep up. My show is continuously evolving.

Bodden hits the stage in Boston Sunday, May 5, at 7 p.m.

Evil in plain sight

Director Joe Berlinger gives Metro an inside look at his film on serial killer Ted Bundy.

MOLLY GIVEN
Molly.Given@metro.us

When you think of a serial killer, it's easy to imagine someone who is evil from the inside out. You see images of killers in court with a solemn look in their eyes, sinister grins and sometimes showing absolutely no remorse. Then you look at photos of Ted Bundy when he was on trial, and the man standing in front of the cameras does not exude any of these so-called "serial killer characteristics." On the contrary, Bundy was charming — he smiled, was well-spoken and seemed likable. Director and true-crime pioneer Joe Berlinger was intrigued by that very fact: How could someone with so much evil inside of them hide in plain sight?

Berlinger decided to delve into the world of Bundy and directed two pictures, the docuseries "Conversations With A Killer: The Ted Bundy Tapes" (available on Netflix now) and the feature-length film starring Zac Efron and Lily Collins, "Extremely Wicked, Shockingly Evil, and Vile." Both pictures are about Ted Bundy and his heinous crimes, but from very different viewpoints. "Conversations With A Killer" focuses on Bundy and his conversations with two journalists before his execution in 1989, whereas "Extremely Wicked" takes a closer look at Bundy's relationship with longtime girlfriend Elizabeth Kendall, née Kloepfer. Berlinger wanted to focus on how Bundy was able to deceive so many people for so long, and why exactly this man was able to get away with murdering innocent victims.

"For me, Bundy defies all stereotypes of what we want to think a serial killer is," says Berlinger. "We want to think a serial killer is some dark and twisted social outcast who's repulsive-looking, because it gives us comfort that these people are easily identifiable in society, and therefore avoidable. I think Bundy teaches us the exact opposite. He was charming and good-looking and had lots of friends and people couldn't imagine that he was capable of doing these things, so he eluded capture for a long time. That's a very important lesson for people."

Berlinger was motivated to cast the spotlight on Bundy after finding out that some people had forgotten about the killer who pretended to be someone he wasn't so convincingly for so long. "I felt like it was time to remind people of a fundamental lesson that I had gleaned in my 25 years of true-crime filmmaking, which is [that] some people we least expect and sometimes trust the most are often capable of the worst evils."

Focusing on Elizabeth Kendall's point of view was paramount to make that lesson seen and heard. "The relationship with Kendall is what made the project interesting to me," says Berlinger. "I am interested in how a killer deceits [sic], how a killer can get away with a murder for so long, how a killer can lure victims to their death and how friends and acquaintances all around them missed all of the signs and clues. I think by seeing the movie through the perspective of somebody who loved and trusted him, we are able to portray that dynamic."

Bundy's looks certainly played a part in his ability to pull the wool over almost everyone's eyes, but his mind is the true puzzle. "I think he is a master manipulator and part of manipulation is convincing yourself. I think there were times that he convinced himself of his innocence, just like I think there are times when people do bad things and convince themselves otherwise. It's human nature to compartmentalize. It's hard to say but I think Bundy probably convinced himself of his innocence while also being highly manipulative and aware of his manipulation."

Another puzzle the film highlights is if a master manipulator and serial killer can even be capable of loving another human being. "I'm not smart enough to tell you if he really loved her. That's one of the questions the movie explores without answering, whether it was a cover for normalcy to get away with his crimes or it was a psychological need that he had for normalcy. Love is many things to many people so it's hard to define love. If by love you mean this selfless embrace of another person and allowing that other person to be their best, which is the classic definition of love, then probably not," says Berlinger.

Bundy and Kendall's relationship seems almost normal throughout the film. She never sees the heinous acts he commits and the audience never sees the heinous acts he commits, either — it's almost as though we are getting duped along with her. "You're going to see some incredible performances to the point of where you will suspend your knowledge through part of the movie that this is a movie about a serial killer. By the end of the film, you too may have a real sense as to what it's like to be deceived by a serial killer."

"Extremely Wicked, Shockingly Evil, and Vile" will drop on Netflix and premiere in select theaters on May 3.

'It is bad to treat dogs as humans' CÉSAR MILLÁN

The canine training expert explained that calm and respect are two fundamental points for a harmonious coexistence between dogs and humans. PATRICIA CARRANZA, MWN

AXEL AMÉZQUITA

What is the main thing to pay attention to when training a dog?
I do not train dogs, I train people. The important thing is to teach humans so that they can show proper direction to canines. The main thing is to have the right energy. This is very important, because the dog does understand and knows how to do things, but if the energy of a human is wrong, then animals will receive it negatively.

How did you start in the canine world?
Many years ago I thought that if humans are not trained, how can they train someone? It is as if a teacher does not know about the subject. At that time, I proposed to open a school of psychology for humans where they would be taught to understand canines.

How to keep your pet calm at pet-friendly sites?
When you take your dog for the first time to some place, it is very important the memory to remind them that they must be calm first and play after. There are ways and techniques for any dog — no matter the breed — to understand what kind of space they are in. Whether it is a cafe, church or a social place — if a human behaves calmly, they will do it, too.

When you adopt and introduce a new pet into your home, what is the first thing you should do?
When you bring a new dog to your house it is very important that you walk it several kilometers before it reaches your place. That way, it will start to associate your place with something calm. As soon as the dog enters, you can tell it where it will stay and which places it cannot enter — for example, the kitchen or your room. It is very important that the dog has limits, because that makes it respectful.

How to maintain harmony between dogs and humans?
The first thing you should know, however basic it may seem, is to be clear if you really like dogs to determine how to behave. The calm and respect of a dog are very important for people to see it as a sociable being. The canine has to form this energy so that any place could be turned into pet-friendly. If the dog is excited, it will not be possible to achieve, and people will ask you to leave. When they are puppies they do not want to fight, they just want to explore. That is when you should tell it to do so in a calm way.

What do you think of treating canines as babies?
I agree that a dog is part of the family and that people say "this is my son/daughter," but we must bear in mind that it learns completely differently and has other needs. Dogs learn through nose, eyes, ears and a human learns through ears, eyes and nose. The dog, by nature, knows how to follow, play and explore, and it is very important that we nurture that part of them. It is bad to treat dogs as humans. We must have that respect toward dogs so that they have that respect toward us.

BOSTON COLLEGE

Learn futuristic skills in these summer courses for adults

Grow in your field, or take a new direction, with classes in data science, entrepreneurship, artificial intelligence and more.

MICHAEL MARTIN

They say that summer bodies are built in the winter; luckily for more of us, winter promotions and raises are often earned in the summer. You've probably heard a lot about how professional development and continuing education can enhance your bottom line. And that's never been truer than it is today, as technology changes hundreds of industries at mind-bending speed.

But don't just sit back and watch it happen. This summer, you can give yourself an advantage in your field, or even orchestrate a lucrative career change. These adult continuing-education courses will let you earn serious skills in some of today's most promising fields.

Data science

In the last few years, data science has emerged as a red-hot industry, with plenty of vacancies. "Demand for data scientists is off the charts," said LinkedIn's 2018 Workforce Report, which pointed to more than 150,000 openings nationwide. "Data science skills shortages are present in almost every large U.S. city." A 13-week summer immersive session at General Assembly — which has several locations and offers remote classes — will school you on the field. (If data isn't your jam, GA offers courses on more basic skills like coding, marketing, design and more.) Immersive session runs from June 3 to Aug. 27; price is $15,950. See generalassemb.ly for more information.

The new small business

If you've been dreaming about being your own boss, this summer may be the time to strike (or at least prepare), while the economy continues to run hot. Capital is still free-flowing; Americans have disposable income to lavish on your product or service. The Boston Center for Adult Education has a range of six-week online courses on starting your own business, from general fundamentals to genre specifics (e.g., arts and crafts, consulting). Courses cost $115 and begin in mid-May, June and July. See ed2go.com for more information.

Content marketing

These days, we're all in the advertising industry. Everyone needs digital marketing skills, even if you're just promoting yourself. The School of the New York Times offers a five-class, on-demand certificate course in Content Marketing, in which five Times experts show you how to promote your business or your clients by creating native advertising, otherwise known as online content and social media. Price: $1,450; seenytedu.com for more information.

3-D printing

In the manufacturing world, the future is 3-D. Starting May 20, MIT is hosting a 12-week online class on the fundamentals and potential of 3-D printing (a.k.a. additive manufacturing, or AM); an MIT professor and guest lecturers will explain how AM's ability to create products and parts on demand can revolutionize a number of businesses that rely on design. Price: $1,950; see additivemanufacturing.mit.edu for more info.

Want to train in person? Artisan's Asylum in Boston also offers classes in 3-D printing and other modern manufacturing skills including laser cutting, screen printing and robotics. Class prices vary; see artisansasylum.com for more information.

Artificial intelligence (AI)

As artificial intelligence comes to more and more industries in the next few years, the robots are still going to need some human help (for a while, anyway). Deeplearning.ai's on-demand class "AI for Everyone" will help you learn what it's all about, and if you can be the genius who can create better jobs by adding AI to your business; reassuringly, that's what the experts say is the goal. See deeplearning.ai for more information.

Managing mental health while studying abroad this summer

Make sure you take care of yourself before your adventure.
PAT KING

With the weather getting warmer and the spring semester coming to a close, many college students are making their plans to fill up that two to three month void between academic years with summer sessions abroad. While these extra summer programs can help students gain needed credits or boost their overall GPAs, many students who suffer from seasonal depression during this time of year may need to take extra precautions before committing to a semester abroad.

Seasonal affective disorder (SAD) affects around 4 to 6 percent of the overall population, with the majority of those people feeling its effects during the colder months of the year. But according to WebMD, about 10 percent of those who suffer from SAD feel the inverse and their depression intensifies during the spring and summer.

This can be an unfortunate struggle to go through especially if you have committed to a summer semester that requires you not only to travel and to be alert during your studies, but also requires you to pay a lot of money upfront to reserve your place within this program.

In a worst case scenario, students do have the option to receive some sort of reimbursement from their school in the case that their mental health is not allowing them to focus on their studies properly. For example, Hofstra University will refund up to 70% of a student's tuition in the case of a mental health withdrawal.

ISTOCK

While different schools have different policies on reimbursing students, many schools prepare their faculties and students with information on how to spot and manage the effects of depression and anxiety while studying abroad. The University of South Florida has come up with some steps in a brochure they titled "Mental Health and Awareness Abroad" that can help students and faculty members to ease the stress of studying in a new country.

The steps include such helpful tips as journaling, routine exercise, familiarizing yourself with your new surroundings before and during your trip, limiting the amount of time you call home, getting a healthy amount of sleep, maintaining a good diet, relinquishing control over whether or not things will go as planned, realizing that you will feel stressed, angry, and depressed and that's okay, of course, not abusing drugs and alcohol during your time away, and many others.

If you are planning on traveling through a summer academic program, make sure to touch base with your school on their policies surrounding tuition reimbursement due to mental health issues for study abroad programs and request literature on how to manage it before it consumes your trip.

Fun summer classes for adults

Express yourself at these fun, creative courses throughout the Northeast.

ISTOCK

One of the better things about modern adulting is that, these days, you're never too old to go to summer camp — whether your taste runs to continuing education, artistic exploration, or literal tent-related hijinks in your own personal remake of "Meatballs." If you're looking to express yourself creatively or just indulge in childhood nostalgia, the Northeast offers no shortage of organized fun this season.

Summer film school

Become an auteur on your own time at the Massachusetts College of Art & Design, which offers a mini film school in the month of June. The course concentrates on documentary filmmaking, covering everything from shooting and editing to producing. Five courses from May 28 to Jun 27; price is $740 per course. See massart.edu for information.

In NYC, the New York Film Academy has two six-week documentary courses, which begin on May 6 and July 8, along with a ton of workshops in other genres — from screenwriting to game design and virtual reality — that last from one to eight weeks. Prices vary; see nyfa.edu for more information.

Adult summer camp

Summer camp for grown-ups has taken off big time in the last few years, promising all of the fun of childhood sleepaway camp and little or none of the trauma. (Although if you want to run your own underwear up a flagpole, we assume they won't stop you.) Camp No Counselors conducts one of the country's most popular iterations on a campsite about two hours from NYC and Philly, offering sports like Capture the Flag, arts and crafts and (naturally) a talent show. From May 30 to June 2 or Aug. 30 to Sept. 2. Prices range from $500-$600; see campnocounselors.com for more information.

Studio art

Summer classes for grown-up artists abound throughout the Northeast. Boston's Museum of Fine Arts offers a summer MFA program in studio art which accommodates all experience levels in a variety of class lengths (starts May 9; see mfa.org for information). The Art Studio NY has classes like "Fear-Free Drawing" and drawing tutorials at the Metropolitan Museum of Art (theartstudiony.com). And Philly's Fleisher Art Memorial offers several immersive summer workshops ranging in length from one night to four weeks (fleisher.org).

Writing classes

You can finally knock out your novel or get that short-story collection out of your brain and onto the page, with Grub Street's wide variety of writing workshops in Boston. Classes in personal essay or short-story writing spur you to create six pieces in six weekly evening sessions; intensive fiction workshops meet five days a week. Concentrations on memoir, young-adult fiction and outlining a novel are also offered. Classes start around mid-May; prices range from $350-$620. See grubstreet.org for more information.

Not to be outdone, the famed Gotham Writers Workshop is offering summer workshops in about every genre imaginable — from blogging to book publishing, mysteries to memoirs, travel to TV — online or at their NYC campus. Prices vary; see writingclasses.com for information.

What it's really like to win money to pay down student loans

As the U.S. student loan balance surpasses $1.5 trillion, a trio of contests promise a lucky few a shot at putting a dent in their debt.

NerdWallet is a personal finance website.

While most of the over 44 million people with student loan debt can't count on winning an oversized novelty check to pay off their balance, they can turn to tried-and-true tactics like income-driven repayment plans to lower monthly payments or refinancing to pay off student loans fast.

But for a select group, these games do bring relief. Here, three winners share details about what it's like, and what it takes to win.

"Paid Off" game show

TruTV's "Paid Off With Michael Torpey" pits contestants against one another to eliminate some or all of their debt. It returns for a second season in May.

Jodeci Richards, 27, of Atlanta won almost $10,000 on the show, about enough to wipe out her remaining loans from Florida State University. She filmed the show in March 2018, but didn't receive the payout until after the episode aired in July. In the meantime, she made payments.

Behind the scenes: The audition process was lengthy, beginning with a Google form application, then phone calls, video interviews, an in-person callback and a background check. Richards said she was a skeptic throughout.

"I wound up actually trying to do a background check on their background checkers, because I wanted to cover myself."

Natty Stories contest

Under its Natural Light brand, Anheuser-Busch is giving away $1 million to help 70 people pay down college debt in 2019.

To enter, student loan borrowers must post a video to social media by May 18 about why they went to college. The video must include the green dollar-sign tab found on limited-edition cans of Natural Light, and the social post must include #NattyStories and #Contest.

RJ Young, 31, of Tulsa, Oklahoma, won $40,000 in the 2018 contest. His entry explains that he went to college to learn to tell compelling stories, but that he needed student loans to pay for it. Young has a bachelor's, master's and is pursuing a Ph.D. in English. He estimates that he owed over $100,000 before winning.

Behind the scenes: Prize money is taxable income. (Richards' winnings were also taxed.) After Young received his check, he used some of the cash to hire an accountant. The remainder stayed in his bank account for almost a year while Young sorted through how the winnings affected his 2018 income taxes.

"It's a first-world problem," Young says. He warns future winners to "be careful who you talk to about it. Not everyone wants to help you."

Givling app

Givling is a trivia game and crowdfunding effort in which users play for cash prizes and $50,000 toward student loan or mortgage repayment.

Players win $50,000 in loan repayment by getting to the top of Givling's queue. They climb the queue by playing trivia, watching ads, buying merchandise, purchasing coins to play extra trivia and using Givling's sponsors, which include SoFi and Uber Eats.

The app funds the prizes — and makes money — from sponsorships, merchandise sales and in-app coin purchases. Once enough is raised, the player at the top of the queue wins $50,000 and the process repeats for the next-in-line player.

Rosheeda Sylvestre, 36, of Brooklyn, New York, won in March. At that time, she had about $52,000 in student loans remaining, down from the roughly $100,000 she owed for two bachelor's degrees and a master's.

The money is applied directly to winners' loans in eight weekly installments; Sylvestre estimates she'll be debt-free by May.

Behind the scenes: Players get two free trivia games daily, but the most competitive players drop tens of thousands of dollars to race to the top of the queue.

Sylvestre says she spent about $10,000 on coins and sponsorship offers, and $11,000 on merchandise. She used a 0% interest credit card that she plans to pay off before interest accrues. She also donated the merchandise she purchased and claimed it as a tax write-off. In total, she spent about $21,000 over nine months before winning.

Business schools, companies getting creative to stem decline in MBA enrollment

Schools are offering shorter, specialized programs that can be done online. In some cases, companies are picking up the tab for their employees.

PROVIDED

One of the obstacles to getting an MBA has always been time. Getting an advanced business degree often means taking time away from the job in which you want to grow. And in today's all-consuming work culture, who can afford to take a break? As the cost of higher education grows, that time has become even more expensive.

It's perhaps unsurprising, then, that applications to full-time, two-year MBA programs were flat in 2018 after four years of decline, according to the Graduate Management Admission Council. Seventy percent of U.S. business schools reported a slide in enrollment last year.

But creative MBA programs are springing up across the country, hoping to buck that trend. Some schools offer degrees that require less time to complete, can be taken online, or concentrate on relatively new specialties like data analytics. Others have customized programs for certain companies, the Philadelphia Inquirer reported last week.

Drexel University in Philadelphia has created an MBA program especially for investment firm Vanguard. The company pays for employees to take the course, which meets three times a week for two hours near its HQ in Malvern, Pennsylvania. Since the program started in 2014, 100 Vanguard employees have gotten degrees. Some give the initiative high marks for convenience. "Vanguard and Drexel have created a good and seamless transition for us with the satellite campus and flexible working schedules," Emily Magee, an education consulting services manager at Vanguard, told the Inquirer. "The peer group has positively impacted me the most. We've been able to discuss course-related and work-related topics, sometimes simultaneously, allowing us to strengthen our performance at school and work."

Coast to coast, top business schools are loosening up. Like Drexel, Stanford and NYU will work with companies to develop MBA programs for their employees. Cornell allows its MBA students to create customized immersion programs in their particular field. Harvard now offers an accelerated leadership development program it's billing as an alternative to a rapid-fire MBA; the course lasts six months, and half the sessions are done remotely.

And the flexibility doesn't necessarily come with a premium: In Harvard's case, the leadership program costs $52,000 — well below the average cost of a two-year MBA, which stands at about $60,000.

Online MBA programs are also booming, and student satisfaction is high, experts say. "It's common for more than half the students to attribute a raise or a promotion at work as a direct result of their online program," wrote John Byrne of PoetsandQuants.com, a site that covers business schools, in Forbes on Friday. "Even more surprising, 40 percent or more of the students say they have changed jobs entirely thanks to their online degrees."

Poll: Massachusetts residents fed up with transportation woes

GETTY IMAGES

Is the Bay State's transportation situation in "urgent" need of help?

The vast majority of Massachusetts workers experience some level of frustration and anger with their daily commutes, according to new polling that suggests residents view the state transportation system as one in "urgent" need of improvement.

Voters also think that MBTA service can be more easily improved than unclogging the state's roads and highways, and generally support state policymakers who want to raise more revenue to address the problem, though it's unclear who they think should pay.

"There can only be one conclusion from this poll: The patient doesn't need a Band-Aid; the patient needs surgery," said Jesse Mermell, president of the Alliance for Business Leadership, in a statement.

"In order to ensure the commonwealth's future economic competitiveness, solutions to this problem must be comprehensive, equitable, and implemented quickly," Mermell said.

Sixty-six percent said action is "urgently needed" to improve the state's transportation system compared to the 21 percent that said they thought the system was working "pretty well."

Sixty-five percent said doing something to address the high cost of housing should also be a priority for policymakers, ranking it behind education and job creation, but ahead of transportation on their priority list.

The survey, done by the MassINC Polling Group, reinforces the perceptions of traffic and commuting in Greater Boston that have fueled a years-long debate on Beacon Hill about what to do about the condition of the state's infrastructure and public transit.

The polling found that 38 percent of voters believe it has gotten harder over the last five years to move around the part of the state where they live, and 80 percent support the general idea of the state raising new money to spend on roads, bridges and public transit.

Users of public transit were more likely than drivers to report becoming stressed or angry by their commutes, being late for work or needing to leave early or later to avoid peak travel times, and to having considered changing jobs or moving because of their commutes.

MassINC did not survey voter opinions on specific tax increases, but did find at least 80 percent support off-peak toll discounts and increasing the frequency of commuter rail trains running to and from Boston to every 15 to 30 minutes "throughout the day, at night, and on weekends."

Support was lower, but there was still a solid majority for Gov. Charlie Baker's pursuit of a regional transportation climate initiative to curb greenhouse gas emissions and raise money for transportation investment (68 percent), as well as the idea of allowing regional ballot questions to raise taxes for specific regional improvement projects (55 percent).

"That's why business leaders continue to prioritize transportation policy advancement: for the convenience of our residents and businesses, and the overall health of our economy."
Jay Ash, director of the Massachusetts Competitive Partnership

"This polling echoes what employers have been hearing from their workers for some time now," said Jay Ash, the former Baker cabinet official who recently took over as director of the Massachusetts Competitive Partnership. "That's why business leaders continue to prioritize transportation policy advancement: for the convenience of our residents and businesses, and the overall health of our economy."

The poll sampled the opinions of 1,200 voters in an online survey from March 15 through March 25. The survey was sponsored by the Barr Foundation and designed with input from a steering committee of policy experts, transportation planners and business leaders, according to MassINC.

Fifty-six percent of those surveyed said their commute to work or school was 30 minutes or fewer, while 11 percent said they commuted between 45 minutes to an hour each way and 7 percent said they had a commute longer than an hour one-way.

The survey also found that 67 percent of voters said they had changed their schedules to avoid the worst travel times and 63 percent had become angry or frustrated by delays and traffic, including more than a third that reported being late for medical appointments, daycare pickups or work.

The commute has become especially bad in Greater Boston, where 30 percent of full-time employees reported considering looking for a new job, and 23 percent said they'd considered leaving the area.

The issue of traffic and unreliable public transit is about more than just headaches, according to lawmakers and business leaders.

Economic development officials worry about the long-term impact to the state's ability to recruit employers to the region, and environmentalists say congestion is hurting the state's ability to fight the impacts of climate change.

Fifty-five percent of voters said traffic in Greater Boston will always be a problem compared to just 19 percent who said the same about the MBTA. Only 35 percent think the right policies could improve traffic compared to 64 percent who think the T could get much better.

Only 3 percent said traffic is not a problem and 7 percent said they were unconcerned with the MBTA's service.

While 19 percent reported using the core subway system regularly and another 9 percent said they rode the commuter rail, preferring to have a car for other errands (41 percent), frequency of trains (30 percent) and reliability of public transportation (22 percent) were reported as the largest obstacles to commuters switching to public transit.

House Speaker Robert DeLeo has promised to have a debate over new revenues later this year, and has asked the business community to be a part of that dialogue, which recently prompted Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce CEO Jim Rooney and Worcester Chamber of Commerce CEO Tim Murray to form a new coalition.

Democratic leaders also continue to support the idea of imposing a surtax on income above $1 million to generate new revenue for transportation and education. DeLeo and state Senate President Karen Spilka are expected to try again to put a question on the statewide ballot in 2022, and there appears to be sufficient support in both branches.

$1M
Democratic leaders also continue to support the idea of imposing a surtax on income above $1 million to generate new revenue for transportation and education.

Seventy-five percent of those polled said improving roads, highways and bridges should be a major priority, followed by reducing traffic (68 percent); making transportation safer for drivers, pedestrians and cyclists (64 percent); and improving public transit (57 percent).

Thirty percent said laying the groundwork for self-driving and electric vehicles should not be a priority at all.

Minorities and older adults boost Joe Biden atop 2020 Democratic field

Former Vice President Joe Biden, expected to declare his run for the White House on Thursday, leads in poll.

Former Vice President Joe Biden, expected to declare his run for the 2020 Democratic presidential nomination on Thursday, leads all other candidates in the race and draws his strongest levels of support from minorities and older adults, according to a new Reuters/Ipsos public opinion poll.

The April 17-23 poll released on Wednesday focused on the vote preferences of 2,237 Democrats and independents: the two groups that may select the Democratic nominee in most of the statewide contests ahead of the 2020 general election.

According to the poll, 24 percent would vote for Biden over 19 other declared and potential candidates.

Another 15 percent said they would support Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who ran a competitive campaign for the Democratic nomination in 2016.

No other candidate received more than 7 percent of public support, and 21 percent said they "don't know" which candidate they would back in a primary.

The poll measures how potential voters feel right now. Many may change their minds as they become better acquainted with the candidates. It has a credibility interval, a measure of precision, of 2 percentage points for the combined group of Democrats and independents.

The statewide nominating contests will kick off in early February next year, led by Iowa.

Biden, 76, who has sought the Democratic presidential nomination twice before, remains widely popular since he left the White House in 2016 after two terms as vice president. The former longtime U.S. senator will announce he is seeking the Democratic nomination on Thursday, a source familiar with the plans said on Tuesday.

Sixty-three percent of all Americans say they have a "favorable" impression of Biden, including 88 percent of Democrats, 59 percent of independents and 39 percent of Republicans.

In comparison, 58 percent of Americans said they have a favorable view of Sanders and Pete Buttigieg, the 37-year-old mayor of South Bend, Indiana, whose upstart campaign has out-raised some of his more established rivals this year.

All three appear to have stronger bipartisan appeal than Republican President Donald Trump. According to the poll, 44 percent of all adults said they have a generally favorable view of Trump.

Biden receives his strongest levels of support from older adults and minorities.

Thirty-two percent of adults who are 55 years old and older said they would vote for Biden over other candidates. And 30 percent of nonwhite adults, including about 4 in 10 African-Americans, said they would back Biden for the nomination.

The poll shows that at this early stage of the presidential campaign, Americans say they will vote for candidates who have been in the national spotlight for a long time.

Body of missing Illinois boy found in shallow grave, parents arrested

The body of a 5-year-old boy who was reported missing from his Crystal Lake, Illinois, home last week was discovered buried in a shallow grave on Wednesday and his parents were arrested on murder charges, local police said.

The remains of Andrew "AJ" Freund were found in a nearby community, wrapped in plastic, based on information provided to investigators by his parents, Crystal Lake Deputy Police Chief Tom Kotlowski said in a statement posted on the department's Facebook page.

"To AJ's family, it is our hope that you may have some solace in knowing that AJ is no longer suffering and his killers have been brought to justice," Kotlowski said in the statement. "To AJ, we know you are at peace playing in heaven's playground and are happy you no longer have to suffer," he said.

GETTY IMAGES

The Chicago Sun-Times newspaper reported earlier this week that police had been concerned at least since September about living conditions in the home where AJ Freund lived with his parents and younger brother.

The paper said that according to police reports the home was cluttered, dirty and in disrepair, with broken windows and the overwhelming smell of feces. AJ's younger brother has been taken into protective custody, the Sun-Times reported.

The boy's father, Andrew Freund, reported him missing on Thursday morning, telling police that AJ was not in bed in the morning. Authorities launched an exhaustive search in and around Crystal Lake, about 45 miles northwest of Chicago, assisted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Police said they would conduct an autopsy on the body, which was found in a remote area of Woodstock, Illinois, about 20 miles northwest of Crystal Lake along a major highway. No cause of death was immediately released.

Television images showed forensic investigators working in a field in Woodstock, shielded by a white canopy.

Both parents, Andrew Freund and Joann Cunningham, were arrested on suspicion of first-degree murder, aggravated battery and failure to report a dead child. They were expected to appear for a bond hearing in the coming days.

An attorney for Cunningham could not be reached by Reuters for comment on Wednesday. It was not immediately clear if Andrew Freund had retained an attorney.

5 Travel rewards myths that could cost you

NerdWallet is a personal finance website.

Twenty-four years ago, I knew so little about travel rewards that I took an around-the-world trip without signing up for a single frequent traveler program. Those lost points and miles still haunt me.

Fast forward to last summer, when our family stayed two nights at a luxury hotel in Venice, Italy. Our room would have cost an eye-popping €1,500, or about $1,700, per night. Thanks to the points I'd accumulated using a travel rewards credit card, this over-the-top stay was free.

There's definitely a learning curve involved when it comes to travel rewards, but delaying your education can be costly if you love to travel. For example, many people misunderstand how much points are worth, either over- or underestimating how much free travel they can get, according to a recent NerdWallet survey.

People also makwe the mistake of carrying balances on those cards (the rewards won't make up for the high cost of paying interest), and far too many people earn rewards that they don't redeem, resulting in billions of dollars of potential value left untouched.

Don't let any of these myths prevent you from making the most of available travel rewards:

Myth 1: Travel rewards credit cards have high annual fees

Some travel rewards cards have no annual fee. Many charge somewhere in the neighborhood of $95 a year. Usually that fee can be offset by using the cards' perks: free checked bags for airline-branded cards, for example, or a free night's stay every year for hotel-branded cards. Even the high-end cards with annual fees of $450 and up typically offer airport lounge access, credits to offset travel fees, and higher rewards rates that can more than pay for the card if you're the right user.

Myth 2: Travel rewards are hard to redeem

Finding free or upgraded airline flights can be a challenge, especially for people who don't plan well ahead. The best time to book a rewards flight is typically 9 to 12 months in advance, when the airlines first make such seats available. (It also pays to check back frequently, since carriers also may add more awards seats depending on how the flights are filling up.)

Hotel rewards are easier to book since occupancy rates are generally lower. If you want even more flexibility, consider a general travel rewards card that allows you to redeem credits for travel purchases or to transfer your points to a variety of frequent traveler programs.

Myth 3: It's best to focus on one frequent traveler program

You may want to concentrate on earning rewards in a single frequent traveler program if you need a lot of points for a special trip. But that doesn't mean you should ignore other programs.

If you love to travel, it's unlikely you do so with only one airline or hotel chain. Plus, spreading your loyalty around means you can take advantage of specials and promotions that help you earn more points or make points more valuable to redeem. Travel programs also often have dynamic pricing, which means the value of rewards can vary. For example, one hotel chain could have lousy redemption options in a city, while another offers a much better deal.

Then there's the issue of devaluation. Programs occasionally devalue their points and miles, meaning it takes more of them to earn the same reward. But they tend to do so at different times. If your rewards aren't concentrated in one frequent traveler program, you won't risk having them all devalued at once.

Myth 4: Travel rewards cards require excellent credit

Travel rewards cards typically require good credit, which is generally defined as a credit score of 690 and above on a 300-to-850 scale. Some require scores of 720 and above. If your scores aren't quite there yet, look for a card that offers cash-back rewards and use those for travel.

Myth 5: Travel rewards aren't worth the effort

Travel rewards programs aren't always intuitive, and some of us invest a fair amount of time trying to squeeze the absolute maximum value out of every point.

But you don't have to be an extreme rewards hacker to benefit. It doesn't take much effort to sign up for hotel or airline frequent traveler programs, or to use a general travel rewards credit card for the spending you were going to do anyway. Sign up for the programs' email newsletters, which can alert you to special deals.

Then make a point to start cashing in those rewards, and you may see what all the fuss is about.

This is an opportunity that the Boston Bruins just have to take advantage of.

With the No. 1 seed Tampa Bay Lightning being swept in the first round of the Stanley Cup Playoffs, the No. 8 seed Columbus Blue Jackets were waiting patiently to see who their opponent would be in the second round. And now we know.

After the Bruins' 5-1 win over the Toronto Maple Leafs in Tuesday night's Game 7 at the TD Garden, it'll be Boston hosting Columbus in Game 1 of the Eastern Conference Semifinals on Thursday.

For months, we had been looking ahead at a potential second-round series between the Bruins and Lightning. The NHL's newer playoff format's set brackets — with no re-seeding — allows us to do that.

Tampa Bay won the Atlantic Division with the best record in the NHL. The Bruins finished second in the Atlantic with the second-best record in the Eastern Conference. The winner of Boston vs. Toronto would for sure have to go through the Presidents' Trophy-winning Lightning in the second round if it wanted to advance to the Eastern Conference Final.

Well, that's what we thought before the wild-card Blue Jackets shocked the hockey world and eliminated the Lightning in four games in the first round. It's not too often you get a break like that, if you're Boston or Toronto or, as we now know, if you're Boston, who eliminated Toronto in the first round for the second consecutive year.

Some might say, "Be careful what you wish for," while pointing out Columbus' dominance over the best team in the NHL. And there's certainly an argument to be made that the Blue Jackets, given what they just did to the Lightning, are just as dangerous a second-round opponent.

But let's not overthink this.

What if I'd told you in February that the Bruins would only have to go through Toronto and Columbus in order to advance to the Eastern Conference Final? You probably would've placed a bet on the Bruins to be one of the NHL's final four teams standing, right then and there.

Should that mindset change just because Columbus defeated Tampa Bay? I don't think so.

At the end of the day, the Stanley Cup playoffs are the most unpredictable playoffs in any sport. You've seen that to this point, with the Lightning being knocked out in the first round and with the Western Conference's No. 1 seed Calgary Flames being eliminated by the No. 8 seed Colorado Avalanche in the first round.

So maybe we shouldn't be surprised if the Blue Jackets end up knocking off the Bruins, who now own home-ice advantage throughout the rest of the playoffs. But if that does happen, it'll have more to do with goaltending than anything else. The matchup of Sergei Bobrovsky and Tuukka Rask will be the most important.

For Rask, it's an opportunity to take advantage of not having to face a Tampa Bay team that scored the most goals in the NHL this year with 325, which is 67 more goals than Columbus scored.

And for the entire Bruins team, it's an opportunity to face the No. 8 seed rather than the No. 1 seed, which will see a big difference in talent, top to bottom, regardless of what happened in the first round.

Say what you want about the Blue Jackets' momentum. With Tampa Bay no longer in the picture, the Eastern Conference is wide open.

And now, it's time for the Bruins to take advantage.

Will Patriots draft a tight end?

Replacing Rob Gronkowski will be key for the Patriots moving forward.

MATT BURKE
matthew.burke@metro.us

Iowa's TJ Hockenson. GETTY IMAGES

In the early portion of the Patriots dynasty it seemed like Bill Belichick drafted a tight end every single year. That reached a climax in 2010, when the Pats selected Rob Gronkowski in Round 2 and He Who Shall Not Be Named in Round 4.

Now that Gronk is retired, could the Patriots go back to drafting tight end heavy? They drafted a TE last year in the seventh round in Ryan Izzo, but haven't selected one in the top four rounds of the draft since taking Gronkowski nine years ago.

Finding trends in the way Belichick drafts is something of a fool's errand as the Patriots usually live by the mantra of "best available." They are also always changing their philosophies on certain positions as running back had been thought of as one of Belichick's least prioritized positions for the past 10 years. That was until last year when the Pats used their second pick of the night, No. 31 overall, on a running back (Sony Michel).

All that said, here is one common link to every Patriots draft dating back to 2006. Every year in the past 13 years, the Pats have taken either a defensive player or an offensive lineman with their first overall selection. Take a look:

2018: Isaiah Wynn, OT
2017: Derek Rivers, DE
2016: Cyrus Jones, CB
2015: Malcom Brown, DT
2014: D. Easley, DT
2013: Jamie Collins, LB
2012: Chandler Jones, DE
2011: Nate Solder, OT
2010: D. McCourty, DB
2009: Patrick Chung, DB
2008: Jerod Mayo, LB
2007: B. Meriweather, DB

In 2006, the Pats took running back Laurence Maroney with their first pick.

Maybe this is the year the Pats break tradition and draft at the position most people think they need help at. But … ahhh … probably not.

TJ Hockenson, Iowa: "Sources from multiple teams say Hockenson did not grade out as high as OJ Howard did in 2017 or Eric Ebron did in 20014 when they went as top 20 picks."

Noah Fant, Iowa: "Team sources feel that Fant's blocking is weak entering the next level."

Irv Smith Jr., Alabama: "He seems to have one speed and is not on the bigger side of tight ends, hence he is not a top 20 caliber specimen."

Jace Sternberger, Texas A&M: "Team sources say that Sternberger is a terrible blocker, which limits how high they are willing to take him."

The Patriots could ride with Austin Seferian-Jenkins at tight end in 2019 but that's putting a lot of pressure on a guy that caught just 11 passes last season.

Draft a big deal but not yet a big betting deal

VSiN

Will the NFL Draft be the next big annual attraction in the world of sports betting (ABC, ESPN, NFL Network, 8 p.m.)?

Despite intense interest in the draft from football fans across the country, and the fact that "NFL is king" in sports betting, the early returns suggest "probably not."

Why not?

Sportsbooks could take a bath! This isn't like betting a game, where a point spread can split the money before the random nature of high level competition influences results. Nobody can be "certain" before a game starts which team will cover a spread. In the draft, somebody knows who's about to get picked. Occasionally a lot of somebodies. Sportsbooks don't want that kind of exposure. They're in business to make money, not hand it away to people with inside knowledge.

"There aren't currently any propositions that are attractive to fans. To date, props are only bringing sharps (professional bettors) out of the woodwork.

Tuesday morning, Jeff Sherman of the Westgate in Las Vegas told Mitch Moss and Pauly Howard on VSiN - NESN's "Follow the Money" that about 95 percent of bets are coming from sharps, 5 percent from recreational bettors. Squares just aren't that interested.

"It's difficult to create props that will be attractive to fans. Maybe there will be a year where the identity of the No. 1 pick is a true toss-up. Half the country thinks it will be one guy, half thinks a different guy, and sportsbooks are there to collect the vigorish at bet levels that limit exposure. That won't happen often, if ever.

Kyler Murray. GETTY IMAGES

"It won't be uncommon for prop results to be determined by whims of poorly run franchises. Who wants to risk money predicting management mistakes? How do you handicap surprise "reaches?"

"Sportsbooks already have great options available to NFL bettors that benefit from draft publicity. Though it's only April, fans can bet "Regular Season Win" totals and futures odds to win divisions, conferences, or the Super Bowl where it's legal.

The NFL Draft is definitely a big deal. Sports media this week has been flooded with mock drafts, trade talk, and general hype. And, what happens during the draft will obviously impact sports betting choices in the future (sometimes for years!). There's just little to drive enthusiastic betting on the draft itself.

Note that VSiN will televise a live "Betcast" for subscribers Thursday night at vsin.com. Enjoy informed commentary about props, win totals, and futures prices from our hosts and special guest analyst Michael Lombardi, former executive with the New England Patriots.
